Abstracts

Campers sleep in suspended hammocks, rather than traditional tents on the ground. They tend to be much lighter than tents because of the lack of poles and the reduced amount of material used. Their weight loss usually results in less internal space than similar occupancy tents. In bad weather, tarps are hung above the hammock to keep the rain off the camping. Mosquito nets, sometimes incorporated into camping hammocks themselves, are also used as climatic guarantees. Campers using camping hammocks are looking for lighter weights, protection for ground-dwelling insects, or other ground complex features such as sloping ground, rocky terrain, and flooded terrain.
