Abstracts

High energy biscuits are light, nutritious and easy to transport. That's why WFP often distributes them in the early days of an emergency.

ROME -- High energy biscuits - or HEBs as they're known in the humanitarian world - are an ideal form of food assistance in the immediate aftermath of a natural disaster such as the earthquake in Haiti.

They contain vitamins, minerals and Others micronutrients along with a dose of energy, which helps give disaster victims the strength they need to steer through the crisis. In addition, because they require no cooking, they provide an immediate solution to food needs.
