Lichen sclerosus is a chronic disorder of the skin, affecting the genital and anal areas. However, in some serious cases, they may appear on upper body such as arms and breast regions. According to various studies, lichen sclerosus is most common in females (after menopause), uncommon in adult males, and very rare in children. Lichen sclerosus appears by forming white spots on the affected regions, the spots may be glossy and smooth in appearance, if untreated they develop into bigger patches. In addition, lichen sclerosus may result in red or purple colored bruises, skin becomes more prone to tear, itching and bleeding. The main cause of lichen sclerosus is still unknown, it is believed to be caused by hyper-immunity reactions or by hormonal imbalance.
