Abstracts

Like basic ethylene, which is highly chemical-resistant, low-density polyethylene (LDPE) possesses similar traits. As a closed-cell foam, the structure is neither completely solid nor completely flexible, rather it assumes a semi-rigid structure. However, even in its semi-rigid form, polyethylene foam can have varying textures, appearing soft like urethane foams or harder like some polystyrene foams. There are two general types of low-density foams, distinguishable from one another by the process with which they are formed.
