Abstracts

The mother' is the culture of beneficial bacteria that transforms apple cider into vinegar. Organic – or unfiltered – strains of apple cider vinegar containing the mother look murkier, and have been linked with improved health benefits. Raw, unfiltered apple cider vinegar contains a cloudy substance that's known as "mother." The "mother" is made up of strands of proteins, enzymes, and beneficial bacteria, which are known as probiotics. In addition to acetic acid, the "mother" is the other main component of apple cider vinegar that's thought to be responsible for its purported health benefits. However, research has not substantiated its associated health claims. Unfiltered apple cider vinegar is also often unpasteurized. It may be more beneficial because it has more active enzymes. However, people who are pregnant or immune-compromised, as well as children, should not consume unpasteurized products. In contrast, filtered apple cider vinegar has had its "mother" and other sediment removed, resulting in a clear, amber-colored product. As such, filtered apple cider vinegar is often perceived as having fewer health benefits but may be safer for the above populations.
