Abstracts

A stoma (also referred to as an ostomy) is an opening made on the front of the abdomen during surgery, which diverts the contents of the gastrointestinal or genitourinary tract outside of the body, and is secured to the skin.

Stomas are red and moist in appearance, and can stick out from the skin by a few centimetres, although some stomas may be flush to the skin. Stoma sites are rich with blood vessels and can bleed easily if knocked or bumped, but otherwise shouldn't cause the patient any pain or discomfort.

Peristomal skin damage refers to injuries that occur around the stoma. While there is much focus on preventing pressure ulcers and other ailments, attention should also be given to preventing all types of avoidable skin damage, including peristomal skin damage.

The skin surrounding a stoma can be damaged either by adhesives, or from exposure to urine and faeces as a result of stoma pouch leakage.

It is essential that the skin surrounding a stoma site is protected from the potentially irritating and excoriating effects of bodily fluids and adhesives.
