Abstracts

The main components of peritoneal dialysate are sodium, chloride, calcium, magnesium, sodium lactate and glucose. The exchange of water and solutes between the peritoneal capillaries and the dialysate, electrolytes and small molecules move from the high concentration side to the low side (diffusion), and water molecules move from the low osmotic concentration side to the osmotic concentration The high side moves (osmosis). Increasing the concentration of dialysate can achieve the purpose of removing water from the body. Through the solute concentration gradient difference, the uremic substances in the blood can be removed from the dialysate, and the electrolyte and acid-base balance can be maintained, replacing part of the function of the kidneys.
