Abstracts

Plastic tanks are made via either rotary molding or plastic injection molding. Typically, manufacturers begin the process by creating a stainless steel canister-shaped mold. The mold details are mapped out on the computer. They then fill the canister mold with plastic granules or powder, seal it and rotate it over a heat source. This allows the plastic material to melt into the mold. Manufacturers then allow the plastic to harden and cool. Once done, they open up the canister to reveal the tank inside. To vary tank thickness, manufacturers just use more or less plastic material.
