Abstracts

Global military helicopter market is witnessing traction as of-late with the stabilization & slight uptick in defense spending across most key global markets mandated by a strong, external threat perception with the evolution of world order & complex as well as challenging geo-political dynamics coupled with an ageing, in-service helicopter fleet and availability of next generation technologies driving an expansion of operational spectrum as well as capabilities of these machines which is likely to further incentivize & accelerate replacement decisions across markets. The industry, however, continues to be under pressure with the military helicopter segment still in demand recovery phase while the civil segment continues to be battered by the sustained downturn in the global energy sector which is likely to stay over near term.

Amongst markets, Asia-Pacific region is likely to lead global demand growth over medium term with a number of large, long term procurement programs aimed at fleet replacement having already been initiated in collaboration with industry OEMs across some key markets in the region. Ongoing conflicts in the Middle East region highlighted by war operations underway against ISIS and across other parts of the region are likely to continue to drive defense spending & demand for military hardware originating from the region over near term. Traditional markets, too, are likely to witness growth opportunities over medium term spearheaded by the Joint Multirole-Future Vertical Lift (JMR-FVL) & IETP programs in the U.S. while Apache procurement in the U.K. is going to be a key priority. Further, Germany's search for a new heavy lift helicopter and France & OCCAR's plans with respect to upgrade horizon for the Tiger platform are going to be significant in Western Europe.

There has also been a growing demand preference for multi-mission helicopters and proven, existing helicopter platforms based on & derived from civil platforms amid a difficult budgetary environment which has also seen the evolution of armed military transport helicopter platforms, development of military variants of civil helicopter platforms and the development of generic weapon system packages for civil helicopters by the industry OEMs. Additionally, the ushering in of unmanned technologies, advent of active protection systems for military helicopters and the development of next generation propulsion systems as well as technologies with the emergence of more powerful traditional propulsion systems and ongoing experimentation with hybrid propulsion systems by key industry OEMs are going to be the other key technology themes & trends which are likely to shape market's evolution & growth over medium term.
