The cinnamon bark extract market is witnessing strong growth driven by its extensive use in food flavouring, nutraceuticals, and pharmaceutical applications. Cinnamon bark (Cinnamomum cassia and verum) extracts contain cinnamaldehyde, eugenol, and polyphenols offering antioxidant, antimicrobial, and blood sugar regulation benefits. Manufacturers are focusing on high-purity cinnamaldehyde extracts, water-soluble powdered forms for beverages, and encapsulated extracts for blood sugar control supplements. Growth is supported by rising demand for natural food flavourings, increasing use in diabetic supplements, and expanding functional beverage formulations. Challenges include regulatory restrictions on coumarin content in certain cinnamon species, flavour variability by origin, and supply constraints from sustainable harvesting. Recent developments include Sabinsa launching water-soluble cinnamon polyphenol extracts for supplements, Xi'an Greena introducing cinnamaldehyde-standardised extracts, and Martin Bauer enhancing cinnamon extracts for functional tea formulations.

Major trends include development of cinnamaldehyde-standardised cinnamon extracts for food flavouring, blood sugar regulation, and antioxidant supplement applications.

Drivers are rising demand for natural flavourings, integration in diabetic support supplements, and expansion of cinnamon-flavoured functional beverages.

Challenges include regulatory limits on coumarin content, supply variability based on geographic origin, and flavour standardisation for product consistency.

Companies focus on enhancing cinnamaldehyde and polyphenol purity, developing water-soluble powdered extracts, and ensuring sustainable cinnamon sourcing practices.

Recent developments include Sabinsa launching soluble polyphenol extracts, Xi'an Greena introducing cinnamaldehyde-rich extracts, and Martin Bauer enhancing functional tea cinnamon extracts.
