Increasing Number of Clinical Studies Fuels Middle East & Africa Aortic Valve Replacement Devices Market

A surge in research activity is driven by several factors, including growing prevalence of aortic valve diseases, advancements in medical technology, and need for more evidence-based approaches to treatment. Clinical studies are crucial in assessing the safety and efficacy of new surgical techniques, prosthetic valves, and transcatheter interventions. These studies also help identify risk factors, optimize patient selection criteria, and evaluate long-term outcomes to improve patient care and quality of life. As the demand for aortic valve replacement continues to rise, so does the importance of conducting robust clinical trials to provide healthcare professionals and patients with the best available evidence for making informed treatment options. With ongoing research and collaboration between medical institutions, the future of aortic valve replacement looks promising, with the potential for even more innovative and effective approaches on the horizon.

A few technological advancements by the players in the aortic valve replacement devices are mentioned below:

- Trial started in January 2019, innovative device for pain management by millimeter band radiation: electronic-pain killer (EPIKARD).

Trial started in January 2017, vascular closure device in transcatheter aortic valve replacement. Evaluation of the safety and efficacy of a percutaneous plug-based large-bore vascular closure device for femoral artery closure in an unselected consecutive patient cohort undergoing transcatheter aortic valve implantation in a single-center prospective study.
