Low CAPEX and OPEX Required for Bare Metal Cloud Infrastructure Fuels the North America Bare Metal Cloud Market

The biggest advantage of deploying bare metal cloud models for organizations is reducing the capital expenditure (CAPEX) and operational expenditure (OPEX) for organizations. Bare metal cloud avails the use of hardware and software services only on a subscription basis as per the amount used. The end-user of this service does not have to pay for owning the hardware and software. Third-party vendor owns, maintains, and upgrades the hardware and software. Also, In the deployment of a bare metal cloud-based solution, the need for servers, backups, upgrade complexity, and version control is eliminated. As bare metal cloud deployments are generally low capital intensive, end-use companies can install cheap and consistent IT infrastructure models. Also, they can focus on their core competencies.

Bare metal cloud model offers significant profits for most organizations at an early stage. The cost savings from the shared infrastructure model are accumulated from:

- Consultant fees
- Data center space
- Electricity
- Cost of hardware such as servers and storage devices
- IT personnel
- Servers
- Software licenses
- Maintenance fees

Bare metal cloud empowers an organization to go for a pay-as-you-go model that could reduce the amount of up-front fees. The fees charged by bare metal cloud vendor is proportional to the usage of bare metal cloud applications. The fee would always be lesser than the installed infrastructure on-premise model. Additionally, concerns regarding maintenance, servicing, and other repairing or downtime due to failure are eliminated in this model. Based on the kind of application deployed, the fee may be significant if multiple integrations are required, and data transfers from old legacy-based systems are required for a smooth transition. These benefits of bare metal cloud solutions drive their demand.

Moreover, the bare metal cloud market players provide their services at low cost to gain a larger customer base. In July 2019, IBM announced that they had reduced the prices of IBM Cloud Bare Metal Servers by 25% for single, dual, quad, and workload-certified bare metal servers. In addition, they increased the standard bandwidth allotments up to 20TB for full bare metal server portfolio and offered the same raw performance, similar premium security, and same customization options of the solutions at significantly lower hourly and monthly operating expenses.
