Surging Application in Healthcare Sector Fuels North America Multimodal AI Market

The integration of many data sources increases the understanding of complex medical conditions as well as provides the framework for more refined and tailored medical treatments. Thus, multimodal AI has a huge potential to alter several aspects of the healthcare sector. In clinical trials, digitalization provides transformative solutions to long-standing issues. Moreover, various AI technologies, including wearable devices and smartphone-enabled self-reported questionnaires, help researchers overcome hurdles associated with time, cost, and participant diversity. Integrating data from several modalities improves information granularity while also allowing for automatic phenotyping and subgrouping. Adaptive trial designs enabled by multimodal AI improve efficiency and responsiveness in overall trials. In May 2022, Bristol Meyers Squibb entered into a strategic collaboration with Owkin. The acquired business employed AI to improve the design and execution of Bristol Meyers Squibb's trials, helping it optimize endpoint definitions, patient subgroups, and treatment impact estimation, including covariate adjustment and external control arms. Owkin uses multimodal patient data in collaboration with major academic centers across the US. This high-quality patient data, which reflects a greater standard of care, powers their AI. They also work together through initiatives such as MOSAIC to include spatial omics and other new modalities into their data offering. Further, Owkin expands its worldwide data network while maintaining data security and academic partner trust in research collaborations by utilizing privacy-enhancing technologies such as federated learning. Multimodal AI also improves remote monitoring and care. The integration of data from wearables, electronic health records (EHRs), and ambient wireless sensors improves remote monitoring customizations. For example, when integrated with wearables, environmental sensors improve fall detection and gait analysis performance, ensuring reliability while reducing false alarms. Thus, the expansion of AI applications in healthcare is driving the North America multimodal AI market .

North America Multimodal AI Market Overview

The North America multimodal AI market is segmented into the US, Canada, and Mexico. North America is an industrially and economically advanced region. The region is witnessing a large number of investments across various domains such as healthcare and IT & telecom. Stanford research published in April 2023 indicated that the US federal government spending in the technological sector increased rapidly in 2022. In June 2023, it was announced that the House Appropriations Committee would be working on passing legislation to include artificial intelligence (AI) in an expanding number of projects. In November 2023, both the Department of Defense (DoD) and the Department of State (DoS) unveiled AI strategies, demonstrating that policy is pulling through and potentially shaping expenditures. Recognizing the importance of this domain to government, Accenture, a multinational professional services corporation, announced plans to open a series of generative artificial intelligence (AI) studios in key North American cities. These studios will be located at Accenture Innovation Hubs in Chicago, Houston, New York, San Francisco, Toronto, and Washington, D.C. The studios will specialize in a variety of industrial use cases, allowing clients to collaborate, execute AI pilots, and quickly scale programs. Thus, all these factors are driving the market in North America.
