Abstracts

The large joint reconstruction market is the principal segment of the orthopaedic devices market and was valued to be worth $12.8bn in 2011. Hip and knee implants constitute the major sub segments of this market. However, the market remained under pressure due to slow recovery following the 2008 economic recession. Decrease in procedure volumes, high unemployment rates and increase in pricing pressures have significantly affected the hip and knee implants market. Most patients preferred living with pain and discomfort than opting for costly replacement procedures, slowing down the growth of the industry. The largest segment in the large joint reconstruction market in 2011 was knee reconstruction with total revenue of $7.0bn, contributing 54.7% share of the total market.

However, the market will witness strong growth during the forecast period from 2012-2022, and will be primarily driven by a growing aging population and increasing incidence of obesity. Osteoarthritis is the most common musculoskeletal disease affecting the people aged above 60 years, causing a surge in the hip and knee replacement surgeries. Moreover, increased direct-to-consumer marketing has raised awareness of available treatments, fuelling market growth. New product innovations, new surgical techniques and better implant materials will further drive growth in the coming years.

Five leading companies - Zimmer, DePuy, Stryker, Smith & Nephew and Biomet control 90% of the large joint reconstruction market. Each of these companies has an extensive portfolio of time tested hip and knee implants. Other significant players include Aesculap, Wright Medical Technology and Exactech. However, smaller companies are getting more innovative and trying to differentiate their products to achieve a significant share of the market. The US remained the global market leader in the large joint reconstruction with a market share of 52.8% and will continue to grow in the coming years. Emerging countries like China and India will witness strong growth in the large joint reconstruction market, primarily due to patient demographics and an increase in healthcare spending as a result of their rapidly growing economies.
