The future of gastroesophageal reflux disease (GERD) management is characterized by a multidisciplinary approach, personalized treatment strategies, and minimally invasive interventions aimed at improving symptom control and quality of life for patients. With GERD being a chronic condition characterized by reflux of stomach contents into the esophagus, there is a growing recognition of the need for holistic management strategies that address underlying causes, trigger factors, and comorbidities. Key trends include the development of novel pharmacological agents such as reflux inhibitors, prokinetic agents, and mucosal protectants that offer alternative treatment options for patients who are refractory to proton pump inhibitors (PPIs) or experience adverse effects. Additionally, there is a focus on lifestyle modifications, dietary interventions, and weight management strategies to reduce reflux symptoms and improve esophageal function. Moreover, there is ongoing research into minimally invasive endoscopic
