Psoriatic arthritis (PsA) is a chronic inflammatory joint disease that affects individuals with psoriasis, causing joint pain, stiffness, and swelling, often leading to disability and impaired quality of life. Key trends in PsA therapeutics include the development of biologic and targeted synthetic disease-modifying antirheumatic drugs (DMARDs) that inhibit specific cytokines and immune pathways involved in the pathogenesis of PsA, such as TNF inhibitors, IL-17 inhibitors, and JAK inhibitors, offering improved control of joint inflammation and prevention of structural damage. Additionally, there's growing interest in combination therapies incorporating DMARDs with different mechanisms of action, such as TNF inhibitors with methotrexate or conventional synthetic DMARDs, for their synergistic effects and enhanced efficacy in PsA management. Moreover, advancements in imaging techniques, including magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) and ultrasound, are facilitating early diagnosis and monitoring of PsA disease activity, enabling timely intervention and personalized treatment approaches for patients with PsA..
